Traditionally, architecture simultaneously reflects and influences culture, in a circle that arcs from national expression through to neighbourhoods, workplaces, and educational establishments. We typically understand this when architecture uses obvious symbols and design language – a temple or church form that symbolises a religion; a smoke stack representing industry and production.

Architecture in this country does not define itself in any singular way, however, there is a prevailing perception. To counter that perception is to reopen the need to link architecture to the wider world of policy – policy other than simple planning regulations – and this involves reopening the question of architecture’s relation to culture.

Germany - Germany - Architecture: Throughout its history, German architecture combined influences from elsewhere in Europe with its own national character. During the medieval period, the Romanesque style dominated. In the 13th century, as the Gothic style took hold, some of Germany's most notable structures were built, including the cathedrals at Cologne (begun 1248) and Strasbourg (planned ...
