This paper investigates the impact of cyclic fuels on the nanostructure, nucleation and overall production of soot in an n-heptane (C_7H_{16}) laminar coflow diffusion flame. The fuels selected to dope the n-heptane flame are cyclopentene (C_5H_8), cyclohexene (C_6H_{10}) and methylcyclohexane (C_7H_{14}). These fuels were chosen for their differences in their structure and sooting tendency.

The impact of cyclic fuels

Controlled formation of gene delivery complexes (DNA and a vector, usually a cationic polymer) is one of the key challenges in developing efficient gene delivery systems. The researchers focused their procedures on the ratio of vector to DNA, neglecting the influence of concentration on the complex formation process.
